Seeking legal protection

No-one ever deserves to be abused. If you are experiencing violence or abuse in your home you have every right to seek protection for yourself and your children.

The law provides several different ways for you to seek legal protection from domestic and family violence.

- The Domestic and Family Violence Act (1989)
- The Queensland Criminal Code (1899)
- The Family Law Act (1975)
- The Peace and Good Behaviour Act (1982)

The Domestic Violence Court deals solely with the Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act. If you wish to pursue legal action under any of the other Acts you will need to seek legal advice.

The Domestic and Family Violence Court Support, Information and Advocacy staff are not able to provide legal advice. There are telephone numbers on the back of this brochure for specialist agencies that can assist you further.

Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act

The Domestic and Family Violence Protection Act (1989) is designed to provide protection to people who have experienced violence, or a threat of violence, from a person with whom they are, or have been, in a spousal, intimate, family or informal care relationship.

You can apply for a Protection Order if you have experienced any of the following:

- physical abuse;
- verbal and emotional abuse;
- damage to your property;
- have been intimidated or harassed;
- have been subjected to indecent behaviour without consenting; or
- have been threatened with any of the above.

Safety at court

If you have concerns about your safety when coming to court please discuss them with the Domestic and Family Violence Court Support, Information and Advocacy Worker prior to the court date. Arrangements can be made to ensure your safety in and around the courthouse.

How do protection orders work?

A Protection Order is a civil order made by the court to stop the 'respondent' (the person who is abusing you) from being abusive or violent towards you, and any other person you have also named on the order (e.g. children, other family members, friends or associates).

If the respondent continues to abuse, harass, intimidate or threaten you, it must be reported to the police. This is known as a 'Breach of the Protection Order' and is a criminal offence. The consequences of breaching a protection order can range from a fine to imprisonment.

All incidents of abuse must be investigated by the police. There is no limit to the number of reports that can be made. For the matter to be successfully prosecuted in court, the police will require evidence that a Breach of the Protection Order has occurred. It is helpful if you can supply the police with any kind of evidence you may have, such as medical reports, statements from witnesses, photographs, etc.

If your circumstances change and the conditions on your Protection Order no longer suit your situation, you can apply to vary the order by adding or removing certain conditions.
